

A Risk Management

Case Study

Our client is an independent charity which investigates the past for the benefit of present communities and future generations. With over 40 years of expansion and experience in linking professional skills and expertise in the practise of archaeology across the U.K., they carry out carefully targeted and cost effective archaeological recording, excavation and research for a broad range of clients and partners.

What did PIB do to help

We first met with the client to discuss their current position and to understand if we could help improve their risk management practices and procedures. Following the meeting we subsequently reviewed their existing documentation and identified a number of areas of risk that were not being addressed. We then produced a full report with an action plan for their board to review.

They had a number of high priority risks in need of attention, including their fire risk assessment procedures and event and site safety, some medium priority risks that included general security and incident reporting, and low-level risks that included their health & safety policy and display and screen equipment.

The client was impressed with our approach and the detail we provided and agreed to retain us as their risk management partner. We've since implemented a good deal of change for them and we regularly attend bespoke committee meetings focused purely on their risk management.

For our organisation, the support and guidance of pro-active, professional and positive risk management advisers is essential. PIB Risk Management easily fit the bill. They have provided support and influence to develop our risk management systems as well as having a positive effect on attitudes to health and safety behaviour across the whole organisation. This shouldn't be underestimated. Their robust, effective, yet simple approach has enabled us to embed a strong, pro-active risk management culture in our organisation and they are always on hand to provide us with advice and assistance when required. I would not hesitate to recommend them to another organisation seeking risk management help.
